Gamesa selects towers from Broadwind Energy for U.S. wind projects

NAPERVILLE, Ill., July 6, 2010—Gamesa Technology Corp., a wholly owned U.S. subsidiary of Gamesa Corporación Tecnológica, a global manufacturer of wind turbine generators with headquarters in Spain and operations in the U.S., Europe, China and India has selected Tower Tech, Inc., a subsidiary of Broadwind Energy, Inc. (NASDAQ:BWEN), to supply structural wind towers for wind sites in the United States for installation in the second half of 2010.

Jim Buddelmeyer, vice president of purchasing at Gamesa stated, "Proven experience, flexibility and well-established competencies were key elements in our decision to select Broadwind's Tower Tech subsidiary to construct our next-generation towers for these projects."

"Tower Tech specializes in the production of heavier and more complex wind towers, with which turbine manufacturers like Gamesa seek to expand the geographic footprint of wind power," said Jess Collins, group president at Broadwind Energy. "We are delighted to extend our long, successful supply relationship with Gamesa through this project."

Tower Tech expects to deliver these towers to Gamesa during fourth-quarter 2010.
